Leah's Joystick - Home @ leahtsjo.Q: why 'this' inside function(fn()) reference current object inside nodejs I'm learning ES6 and node.js. I found that I can refer this inside function (fn()) to refer any object inside that function as if it was outside. I just wonder why the this was used inside this function. // global variable var global = { a: 1, b: 2, c: 3 }; //module declaration var myModule = (function(global, global, global) { console.log(this); //output global object function run() { console.log(this); //output global object console.log(global); //output global object console.log(global.a); //output global object console.log(global.c); //output global object console.log(global); //output global object console.log(global.b); //output global object console.log(global.c); //output global object console.log(global); //output global object console.log(global.c); //output global object } return { run: run }; }(global, global, global)); module.exports = myModule; A: what you are talking about is called lexical scoping in javascript. i'm gonna focus on your code and try to explain it as simple as possible. // global variable var global = { a: 1, b: 2, c: 3 }; //module declaration var myModule = (function(global, global, global) { //the function(global, global, global) expression is evaluated first console.log(this); //output global object function run() { console.log(this); //output global object console.log(global); //output global object console.log(global.a); //output global object console.log(global.c); //output global object
